The child's attachment type was assessed as insecure resistant. During the procedure, the child displayed some behavioural patterns related to disorganized attachment type.

Conclusions

The mother presented herself as a mother who follows the child's leading, however in real interactions she is not capable of doing so.

This case study of so-called attachment parenting brings about more questions than answers:

- Is there a hidden trauma that enables the mother to read the child's negative affects and respond to them accurately?
- Is it possible that a strict following of attachment parenting rules is a sign of maternal insecurity and trauma?
- Does the attachment parenting in this case serve as a form of dissociation?

References
